Modernizing Repression: Police Training, Political Violence, and Nation-Building in the “American Century”

Our police training program is a vital part of our effort to help less developed countries achieve internal security, which is essential if economic development is to help create viable free nations.

For the first three days, the police beat me continuously. When I regained consciousness they beat me again

During the 2004 presidential election campaign, Vice President Richard Cheney called for the “Salvador option” in Iraq, implying the training of local paramilitary and police forces to “pacify” the insurgency and restore public order.⁴ As in El Salvador in the 1980s where the CIA was implicated in the training of death squads, the results so far have been catastrophic. American-trained police have been infiltrated by insurgents and found responsible for a litany of human rights abuses, including participation in sectarian warfare, torture, and revenge killings. They have only added to the nation’s growing anarchy and the suffering of its people, while further tarnishing America’s

1 reputation.⁵ Though neglected in public debates and commentary, American 2 strategy in Iraq—and its pitfalls—represents a stark continuity from the Cold 3 War and imperial eras when the United States provided technical aid to local 4 police and built up the penal apparatus of client regimes in order to promote 5 social stability and export Western administrative systems.⁶ Presented to the 6 public as humanitarian initiatives to strengthen democratic development, these 7 programs fulfilled a less explicit agenda in securing the power base of local elites 8 amenable to U.S. economic and political interests and contributed to extensive 9 human rights violations. They also often backfired politically, breeding animosity 10 and resistance and fuelling vicious cycles of violence.

11 This article seeks to analyze the implementation of and paradoxes sur-12 rounding the police training programs, demonstrating how they were con-13 ceived as mechanisms for advancing American strategic interests and why they 14 resulted in the spread of political repression and violence. With remarkable 15 continuity, police aid was used not just to target criminals but to develop 16 elaborate intelligence networks oriented towards internal defense, which 17 allowed the suppression of dissident groups to take place on a wider scope and 18 in a more surgical and often brutal way. In effect, the United States helped to 19 modernize intelligence gathering and political policing operations, thus mag-20 nifying their impact.⁷ They further helped to militarize the police and pro-21 vided them with a newfound perception of power, while schooling them in a 22 hard-line anticommunism that fostered the dehumanization of political adver-23 saries and bred suspicion about grass-roots mobilization.⁸ These trends were 24 most marked in Vietnam, where the democratic ideal of the police as public 25 servants became difficult to uphold amidst the backdrop of a counterrevolu-26 tionary war in which they were an integral component. Although the United 27 was not always in control of the forces that it empowered and did not 28 always condone their acts, human rights violations were not by accident or 29 the product of rogue forces betraying American principles, as some have

1 previously argued.⁹ They were rather institutionalized within the fabric of 2 American policy and its coercive underpinnings.

3 Much recent scholarship in American diplomatic history has focused on 4 modernization theory and anti-Communist nation-building as the key motivat-5 ing factors shaping U.S. foreign policy in the Cold War.¹⁰ The police training 6 programs, I argue, were central to both processes. They served key political and 7 ideological functions in providing the internal security and order deemed nec-8 essary for the implementation of liberal-capitalist development programs. They 9 were crucial, further, in upgrading the surveillance capacity of developing world 10 states, thus allowing for a more extensive carrying out of social control—the 11 ultimate marker of modernity in the postenlightenment era.¹¹ Therein lay their 12 dark side.

14 SUBTLE MECHANISMS OF CONTROL: IMPERIAL ERA THROUGH 15 THE EARLY COLD WAR

16 America's training of foreign police was modeled after European colonial 17 practices. Promoting a divide-and-rule strategy, colonial administrators relied 18 on indigenous police to control unrest and promote law and order. They pro-19 vided them with modern equipment and training, which resulted in an intensi-20 fication of state repression, as in British Kenya and French Indochina.¹² In 1898, 21 the United States entered the great "imperial game" through its colonization of 22 the Philippines, where occupation forces assisted in the creation of a local 23 constabulary—or police force organized along military lines. Its main functions 24 were to restore order in the cities, enforce conscripted labor programs designed

1 to build-up the country's infrastructure, and bolster ongoing pacification efforts, 2 particularly in the rebellious Moros provinces.¹³

3 From the 1910s through the 1930s, occupation officials trained police to 4 fulfill a similar purpose in Nicaragua, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic, where 5 they sought to impart new professional standards to enhance social control, 6 including a reliance on uniformed officers, scientific modes of detection, such 7 as fingerprinting and mug shots, and expanded communications. They also 8 introduced penal reforms, including modern cell structures, trade schools, and 9 improved sanitation, which were rendered negligible by the political context 10 and poor relations with local officials.¹⁴ Terrible abuses occurred in Haiti, where 11 racism towards the indigenous population and exploitative economic practices 12 tarnished the credibility of American occupying forces. As popular resistance 13 developed, the United States created a police Gendarmerie to oversee the forced 14 roping together of native chain gangs, who worked to modernize the country's 15 infrastructure under Corvée labor laws remnant from French colonialism.
16 According to Brigadier-General Smedley Butler and Lieutenant-Colonel 17 Alexander S. Williamson who headed the police force, local officers were intoxicated 18 by their newfound authority and given to excessive drinking of native 19 liquor (taffia), resulting in "unnecessarily harsh and brutal" conduct, echoing 20 later developments in the Cold War.¹⁵ A missionary observer, L. Ton Evans, 21 further testified before Congress that they served alongside the U.S. Marines as 22 "an instrument of oppression and torture" in enforcing the "barbaric" marching 23 of men "like a pack of slaves" under the Corvée system, as the Belgians had done 24 in Africa. He added that political prisoners who avoided execution were regularly 25 beaten and deprived of food, causing them to faint, and that dead bodies 26 covered with vermin remained exposed in the prison yards.¹⁶

1 These conditions were not unique to Haiti, but also prevalent in the Domini-2 can Republic and U.S. South, where prisons were notorious for racial discrimi-3 nation, violence, and brutal labor regimens and considered to be worse than 4 slave plantations.¹⁷ The harsh reality cuts deep into myths of national excep-5 tionalism and virtue embraced by those who sought to remake countries like 6 Haiti in the American image.¹⁸ Over the long-term, the police constabulary 7 evolved into the political instrument of dictator Francois “Papa Doc” DuValier, 8 much like with Rafael Trujillo in the Dominican Republic and Anastasio Somoza 9 in Nicaragua who emerged from their rank.¹⁹

10 Police operations grew in scope in the aftermath of the Second World War 11 and accorded well with America’s Cold War “mission” to export Western-style 12 institutions and improve governing efficiency in a postcolonial environment.²⁰ 13 They were central to U.S. occupational efforts in South Korea and Japan, where 14 the main aim was to promote public security, while quelling radical protest, 15 labor strikes, and antioccupation resistance.²¹ In Japan, police decentralization, 16 reform, and constitutional provisions for the protection of civil liberties led to 17 the curbing of the most egregious abuses of the fascist regime, thus helping to 18 legitimize U.S. political authority.²² When communist influence was deemed 19 to be threatening, nevertheless, even liberal New Dealers supported acts of 20 police repression.²³ In South Korea, where unrest from below was more

51 work shows that the Japanese police committed many human rights violations, often behind

1 protracted, police trained at an American-built National Academy developed an 2 especially poor human rights record, owing in part to the repressive anticom-3 munism of President Syngman Rhee and his lack of nationalist legitimacy. They 4 were described in one top secret State Department report as the “hated instru-5 ment of an autocratic government.”²⁴ Consisting of many Japanese colonial 6 collaborators, the police detained over 17,000 political prisoners, including 7 newspaper editors responsible for printing “inflammatory articles.”²⁵ They also 8 assisted the military in “pacifying” nationalist uprisings, including that on the 9 southern island of Cheju, where tens of thousands of civilians were massacred 10 prior to the official outbreak of the Korean War in 1950.²⁶

11 According to Information Officer John Caldwell who was ardently anti-12 communist and pro-Rhee, U.S. police advisers operated under the premise that 13 “the ‘gooks’ only understood force,” accounting in part for their embrace of 14 repressive methods.²⁷ During the war itself and in its aftermath, historian Greg 15 Brazinsky writes, police units were “especially brutal in exacting merciless 16 punishment and revenge” on those who had cooperated with the North Korean 17 military, “sometimes slaughtering them.” When the National Assembly tried 18 to pass a measure urging greater prudence, Rhee objected, with American 19 approval.²⁸ Until his death in 1960, he continued to utilize the police to spy on 20 political opponents and, according to the State Department, undertake “extra-21 legal and violent tactics” against civilians, including murder.²⁹ Though publicly 22 trying to distance themselves, U.S. policymakers were largely responsible in 23 that they had provided extensive technical funding and training for a security 24 apparatus that lived up to its original aim of protecting Rhee’s power base and 25 preventing the spread of communism.

26 Together with Japan, South Korea would help crystallize the view among 27 policy elites that a nation’s police force was the critical factor needed to provide

28 closed doors, and had connections to criminal syndicates. See also Theodore Cohen, Remaking

1 for its internal defense.³⁰ This emphasis shaped the orientation towards political 2 policing and militarization, accounting for the high level of humanitarian abuse.
3 In 1955, the State Department initiated its first police program in Indonesia
4 through the International Cooperation Administration (ICA), where it devel-5 oped a mobile brigade to serve as a counterweight to the military, which was 6 loyal to President Achmed Sukarno. The Eisenhower administration opposed 7 him because of his leadership in the nonaligned movement and legalization 8 of the Communist party (PKI). The United States would go on to channel 9 police aid, including thousands of carbines, guns, and tear gas bombs, to separ-10 atist leaders mounting a campaign of subversion against Sukarno.³¹ He was 11 eventually dislodged in a 1965 coup led by General Suharto, who utilized lists 12 created by American-sponsored police and intelligence organizations to liqui-13 date the PKI, resulting in what internal reports characterized as “among the 14 worst mass murders of the 20th century.”³² These events showed the dark 15 potential of U.S. assistance programs, which led to the growth of powerful 16 security networks that served the interests of local forces operating above the 17 rule of law and could easily spiral out of control.

18 In Thailand, where the police became the most powerful entity in the 19 country, the CIA cultivated close ties with Phao Sriyanon, the pro-Western 20 chief, who was admired for his forceful leadership and administrative skills.
21 Through police aid and a front corporation, Sea Supply, over 200 advisers 22 provided him with armored vehicles, small arms, radio equipment and bazookas 23 that greatly enhanced the police’s intelligence-gathering capabilities and 24 enabled him to mount a force totaling 48,000 men, including 10,000 in 25 Bangkok.³³ Owing to the devolution of the state’s monopoly on violence, Phao’s

1 men engaged in the “disappearance” of political rivals, including four members 2 of Parliament. They also took control over the regional opiate trade, which was 3 made more profitable by modern transportation capabilities (in another unin-4 tended consequence of the police programs).³⁴ Federal Bureau of Narcotics 5 (FBN) chief Harry J. Anslinger wrote in a 1959 internal memo that the Thai 6 police were so corrupt it “came out of their ears,” while a 1972 State Depart-7 ment report conceded that Phao deserved his “poor reputation as a result of his 8 involvement in nefarious activities.”³⁵

9 In January 1959, in order to help facilitate anti-Communist nation-building 10 and modernization after the military had consolidated power, the State Depart-11 ment sent James Bennett, Director of the American Bureau of Prisons and a 12 former Warden at Lewisburg Penitentiary in Pennsylvania, to survey and 13 develop a plan to overhaul the Thai prison system. Bennett found that most of 14 the holding facilities were “overcrowded” and frequently held inmates for 15 “considerable amounts of time without charge,” often confining them to “leg 16 chains.”³⁶ In line with similar reforms being undertaken in U.S. prisons, he 17 recommended expanding opportunities for education and prison works, speed-18 ing up court procedures, and establishing a probation system.³⁷ Because the 19 priorities of an incipient counterinsurgency campaign against the underground 20 activities of the Thai Communist party came to assume top priority, however, 21 there is scant evidence that any of these initiatives were ever implemented.
22 Foreign aid nevertheless contributed to the expansion of the nation’s penal 23 apparatus, thus enhancing the scope of state repression.³⁸ Even if desiring to 24 improve the human rights climate, American advisers could not ultimately 25 control how the money and equipment was being used by local officials whom 26 they were empowering and often did not care to, so long as American interests

4 “A MORE USEFUL COUNTERSUBVERSIVE INSTRUMENT THAN 5 THE MILITARY:” FLEXIBLE RESPONSE AND THE OFFICE OF 6 PUBLIC SAFETY

7 By the end of the Eisenhower era, American police programs employed 115 8 technical advisers in twenty-four countries at a budget of $14.2 million.³⁹ 9 The Kennedy administration escalated them to new heights. Contrary to the 10 humanitarian image promoted in popular culture and in a series of fawning 11 memoirs written by former aides, Kennedy was an ardent cold warrior who 12 embraced violence as a means of upholding American hegemonic interests.⁴⁰ 13 Opposed to Eisenhower’s commitment to an arms build-up, Kennedy promoted 14 a flexible response doctrine calling for new counterinsurgency strategies to 15 counter radical nationalist movements in the developing world.⁴¹ He empha-16 sized a strengthening of the military and policing capabilities of pro-Western 17 regimes in order to provide them with the stability deemed necessary for eco-18 nomic development and modernization.⁴² In 1961, in the aftermath of the Bay of 19 Pigs debacle, Kennedy convened a Special Group on counterinsurgency (CI)
20 headed by Robert Kennedy and four-star General Maxwell Taylor who cham-21 pioned unconventional forces and the Green Berets.⁴³ They met each Thursday 22 and embraced police training as a cost-effective means of promoting national 23 security.⁴⁴

24 The driving figure behind this position was National Security Council 25 Adviser Robert Komer, who later became the Director of Pacification in 26 Vietnam. In May 1961, Komer had conducted a study of Eisenhower’s police 27 operations, which he termed “an orphan child that nobody seems to be paying 28 any attention to.” “The 30 million that we give is small potatoes,” he wrote in 29 a memo to the Special Group. “The police are in many cases a far more 30 effective and immediately useful counter-subversive instrument than the 1 military. Indonesia is a great example. The mobile brigade that we support is 2 more like a paramilitary force.”⁴⁵ In another memo to Taylor and McGeorge 3 Bundy, the President’s Special Assistant for National Security Affairs, Komer 4 stressed that the police were “more valuable than Special Forces in our global 5 counter-insurgency efforts” and particularly useful in fighting urban insurrec-6 tions. “We get more from the police in terms of preventative medicine than 7 from any single U.S. program,” he said. “They are cost effective, while not 8 going for fancy military hardware. They provide the first line of defense 9 against demonstrations, riots and local insurrections. Only when the situation 10 gets out of hand (as in South Vietnam) does the military have to be called 11 in.”⁴⁶

12 Komer’s analysis was similar to academic modernization theorists who, in an 13 updating of the White Man’s burden, felt that Third World peoples could be 14 uplifted through the importation of modern technology and Western adminis-
15 trative systems, of which policing was seen as a cornerstone. They also valued 16 military and police training in its capacity to provide the security deemed 17 necessary for the success of foreign aid programs and achievement of economic 18 “take-off,” which could then undercut support for left-wing social movements.⁴⁷ 19 Ironically, in practice, the programs often yielded the opposite effect, resulting 20 in an escalation of political violence, instability and resistance. Komer was 21 influenced by Sir Robert Thompson of Britain, a RAND Corporation analyst
22 who had become the darling of American policymakers as an expert on coun-23 terinsurgency. He had devised a successful strategy to defeat a Chinese-backed 24 uprising in Malaya, in which peasants were relocated into fortified government 25 zones and won over through reforms.⁴⁸ This became the basis for the Strategic 26 Hamlet program in South Vietnam, where police were organized to protect 27 vital installations from guerrilla infiltration. Thompson viewed civilian police as 28 being effective in intelligence gathering and more capable than military officers 29 in implementing civic action programs, including public works and moderate land reform, which were designed to win the political war for “hearts and minds.”⁴⁹

In 1962, the Special Group established the Office of Public Safety (OPS) within the U.S. Agency of International Development (USAID) to “develop the civilian police component of internal security forces in underdeveloped states” and be able to “identify early the symptoms of an incipient subversive situation” (Figure 1)⁵⁰ Headed by former CIA operative Byron Engle, who had run the police programs in Japan, the central aim was to further maintain law and order and internal defense “without unnecessary bloodshed and an obtrusive display of the bayonet.”⁵¹ Many OPS training manuals stressed the need to demilitarize the police and promote nonlethal methods of riot control and control of mobs so as to maintain a positive image (Figure 2). Pointing to the Laotian conflict, where the CIA had subverted elections in 1958 and backed a right-wing coup, causing the growth of an underground guerrilla movement (the Pathet Lao, who attained a majority of seats in the parliament), one internal State Department memo noted that “the police were able to operate without interference in Pathet Lao controlled areas and earned great respect from the population through close contact. The [Royal Lao] army meanwhile was ambushed in these areas because it lived off the land, burned villages and had aroused widespread hatred.”⁵²

Over the long term, it is questionable to what degree this model was sustained given the mounting popular resistance that developed against U.S.-backed forces and the shift to a strategy of building a clandestine army among the indigenous Hmong. The OPS rapidly expanded nevertheless to include operation in twenty-six countries and spent over $210 million in Southeast Asia, including $88 million in Thailand, $94 million in South Vietnam, and $10 million in Indonesia.⁵³ In Latin America, where AID Director David Bell told Congress that the police were “strongly anticommunist and a bulwark against

(IPA) in Washington, DC, which became known as the “West-Point of the law enforcement community” and trained over 100,000 foreign police, including 600 high-ranking officers.⁵⁵ OPS advisers were usually of the rank of detective and above and recruited from the ranks of the FBI, CIA, and Special Forces. They took pride in their ability to serve as “missionaries of modernization,” as one historian termed it.⁵⁶ They saw it as their duty to bolster organizational efficiency and police professionalism in targeting both criminals and subversives—an ability that was seen as central to nation-building by liberal policy elites who had supported the growth of the FBI as vital to the New Deal national security state.⁵⁷

Operating under the premise that good policing was a pivotal characteristic of a modern nation, the OPS introduced technical innovations and provided foreign police with skills in management, finger-printing, intelligence gathering, counternarcotics, and counterterrorism, as well as more mundane tasks like traffic control and licensing. They stressed the importance of record keeping as a means of elevating arrest and prosecution rates and provided funds to upgrade

1 police benefits and pay to help limit corruption.⁵⁸ They also helped to supply 2 state-of-the-art equipment, including modern radio and telecommunication 3 instruments, fingerprint kits, Smith & Wesson revolvers, and laboratory mate-
4 rials. This was in addition to new police cruisers and vehicles, hand grenades, gas 5 masks, and shields for riot control.

6 Because the police often served as the enforcement arm of undemocratic 7 regimes valued for their anticommunism, and were oriented towards internal 8 security and social control, the new equipment frequently resulted in an inten-9 sification of state repression, which was in effect modernized.⁵⁹ The creation of 10 elaborate intelligence infrastructures allowing for better coordination in 11 tracking down subversives, who often represented popular aspirations for 12 social justice and change, enhanced this development, as did the trend towards 13 militarization. Though in theory OPS trainees were supposed to be apolitical, 14 when “all the chips were down,” internal reports conceded, they were militantly 15 anticommunist and predominantly conservative, owing in part to their training.
16 One feature of the IPA course was to school the students in anticommunist 17 ideology. The culmination was a mock counterinsurgency operation, where they 18 had to suppress a disturbance and protect the ruling government from being 19 swept from power. Observers noted that the stimulation was harder than real life 20 and that officers returned home with a certain “swagger,” ready to engage in the 21 fight against communism—at whatever the human cost.⁶⁰

22 Through an examination of student papers, a congressional investigating 23 committee headed by Senator James Abzourek (D-ND) came to suspect that the 24 IPA condoned torture. One Nepalese student wrote that “torture is a practical 25 necessity in extracting information as a last resort.” A Vietnamese student added: 26 “Despite the fact that brutal interrogation is strongly criticized by moralists, its 27 importance must not be denied if we want to have order and security in daily 28 life.”⁶¹ These comments exemplify how the emphasis on order and security came 29 to trump considerations about civil liberties during the Cold War, thus magni-
30 fying political repression. IPA students were tellingly shown Gilo Pontecorvo’s 31 film the Battle of Algiers, which depicted graphic scenes of torture undertaken by 32 the French police who wreaked reprisals on Algerian nationalists at night.⁶²

1 Instructors responded to criticism by claiming that “the questionable techniques 2 of extracting information” helped to create “abhorrence among students for 3 inhumane methods.”⁶³ Amnesty International, however, documented wide-4 spread physical and psychological torture by police in twenty-four of the forty-5 nine nations that hosted OPS police training teams.⁶⁴ Declassified interrogation 6 manuals used at the academy display a particular emphasis on sensory deprivation 7 and other psychological torture techniques derived from CIA-funded mind 8 control experiments, which were widely adopted across the so-called Third 9 World.⁶⁵

10 The training of police in riot control and halting urban insurrections and 11 strikes hastened the link to human rights violations. In principle, this was 12 designed to lessen the degree of violence, as students were taught to use tear gas 13 as an alternative to submachine guns so that “no martyrs were created and the 14 Communists had nothing to exploit.”⁶⁶ In practice, however, there were few 15 efforts at regulation. The sanctioning of moderate degrees of force further 16 served as a barrier to peaceful reconciliation and reinforced existing power 17 relations. OPS trained police were linked to severe beatings, often of nonviolent 18 demonstrators. In El Salvador, adviser Adolph Saenz candidly reports in his 19 book The OPS Story that police issued wooden batons by the United States 20 clubbed to death a young student protesting against social inequalities in the 21 country, while injuring many others quite brutally.⁶⁷ The State Department later 22 rationalized human rights abuses by attributing them to “pervasive cultural and 23 legal attitudes typical of lesser developed countries,” which, it predicted, would 24 “be overcome as the country gradually modernizes.”⁶⁸

25 Similar stereotypes were invoked to rationalize the involvement of OPS-26 trained police in extortion and graft, which was largely a product of continuously 27 poor pay and legal impunity. Many were also implicated in the narcotics traffic, 28 in some cases to fund their political operations or to supplement their income.⁶⁹
29 Embassy officials and the CIA often turned a blind eye so long as the police

1 continued to serve what were perceived to be American national security inter-2 ests.⁷⁰ In Thailand, for example, intelligence reports estimated that 90 percent 3 of the police were “graft-prone” and “bribed and paid protection fees by the 4 smuggling syndicates,” which “the government had little desire or power to 5 stop.”⁷¹ The United States nevertheless escalated support for strategic reasons, 6 including a desire to retain air bases crucial to the waging of war on Vietnam. On 7 September 28, 1971, Ambassador Leonard Ungar brokered a pact to send Black 8 Hawk helicopters to the Thai police ostensibly for counternarcotics purposes, 9 although Congressman Lester Wolff (D-NY) discovered that they were used in 10 an increasingly brutal counterinsurgency campaign.⁷² Internal reports also show 11 how the OPS focused on building the paramilitary capabilities of the Thai 12 border police, who assisted in countering local subversion and mounted raids 13 into neighboring Laos, where they compiled an atrocious human rights record 14 fighting alongside the CIA’s Hmong Army.⁷³

15 The situation in Thailand was no anomaly, as the OPS frequently created 16 rural mobile police units designed to track down guerrilla units and also, para-17 doxically, win popular support through building schools and promoting eco-18 nomic and infrastructural development. The civic action dimension, however, 19 usually received short shrift, largely because of the emphasis placed by policy-20 makers on geostrategic and Cold War considerations, as well as the nature of 21 their training in counterinsurgency. The oppressive reputation of the police, in 22 turn, made the public fear their intentions, resulting in added hostility and 23 conflict, and violent cycles of retribution.

24 In Colombia, where the United States escalated advisory support in the early 25 1960s after the Cuban revolution, OPS reports proudly document the role of 50 reason was the offering of bounties for the cut off of enemy ears by CIA advisers like Tony Poe. 10

1 the police in “neutralizing leftist and terrorist groups” as a result of expanded 2 telecommunications and killing “bandits” loyal to the ELN (Ejercito de Lib-3 eration Nacional) and Camillo Torres, a sociology professor and populist priest 4 murdered under suspicious circumstances.⁷⁴ In one incident during the “dirty 5 war,” police entered a bar and killed three alleged guerrilla supporters as well as 6 a female employee.⁷⁵ The language shows how the dehumanization of political 7 adversaries, who threatened U.S. business interests, in this case, by promoting 8 the nationalization of state resources, was used to rationalize acts of police 9 violence and terror. Not coincidentally, OPS trained units evolved into opera-10 tional death squads across the Southern Cone.⁷⁶ Though not directly involved 11 with or necessarily condoning them, American officials had helped to set up an 12 opportune climate in which they could flourish and did not often press for legal 13 censure. Products of a Cold War ideological mindset, they held to the notion 14 that the ends justified the means.

16 UNDER THE FAÇADE OF BENEVOLENCE: RIOT CONTROL AND 17 FURTHER HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS

18 Fitting with its social control function, the OPS frequently delivered emer-19 gency equipment to curb rioting that threatened to topple pro-U.S. regimes.
20 This was a recipe for disaster, in part because there was little oversight of police 21 activity or way of monitoring how the equipment might be used.⁷⁷ In June 1963, 22 after demonstrations erupted in Tehran against American backed dictator, Shah 23 Mohammed Reza Pahlevi, the OPS provided over $500,000 in riot-control gear.
24 The State Department later expressed gratification to Chief of Police Abdollah 25 Vasiq for crushing the protests, even though they had killed at least one major 26 mullah and helped to engender support for Islamist oppositional forces.⁷⁸ In

7 Guerrilla warfare commenced soon thereafter.⁸⁰

8 As these cases demonstrate, the attempt to impose social stability through 9 force often backfired in breeding animosity and resistance, resulting in ever 10 harsher government social control mechanisms and the eventual onset of civil 11 war and revolution.⁸¹ In packaging the OPS programs publicly, government 12 officials stressed the importance of police training to the democratization 13 process, which the media often accepted uncritically.⁸² They claimed that the 14 OPS instilled humane policing standards and denied assistance to authoritarian 15 states, including Nicaragua under the Somoza dynasty.⁸³ This was far from 16 reality.⁸⁴ In the Congo, for example, in order to quell civil unrest following the 17 CIA-supported murder of the anti-imperialist Patrice Lumumba, the OPS 18 equipped the secret police of Joseph Kasavubu (1961–1964) and Dictator Joseph 19 Mobutu (1965–1994) with grenades, shells, jeeps, and helmet liners courtesy of 20 Firestone rubber. They also constructed a national police school equipped with 21 a firing range. According to the State Department’s own assessment, Mobutu

3 Case officers, nevertheless, expressed satisfaction for their role in helping to 4 suppress popular uprisings in conjunction with South African mercenaries and 5 industrial police forces established to protect Belgian-owned installations and 6 plantations.⁸⁵

7 Elsewhere in Africa, the OPS spent over $700,000 in developing a police 8 college in Ethiopia and a new imperial police force trained in part by Israeli 9 advisers who proved “effective in riot control” as a result of the “authoritarian” 10 character of the emperor Haillie Selassie.⁸⁶ The OPS also funneled arms into 11 Kigali, Rwanda, via military airlift to avoid customs in supporting “graft ridden 12 police” loyal to President Gregoire Kayibanda against “Chicom supported Tutsi 13 terrorists,” as the U.S. embassy portrayed them.⁸⁷ These were in fact a group of 14 poor refugees deprived of political rights and expelled from their homeland as a 15 result of a racist campaign by “Hutu Power” extremists who would later commit 16 genocide against the Tutsi.⁸⁸ Insensitivity to regional variation and the inclina-17 tion to see a Soviet or Chinese hand in all political conflict ultimately helped to 18 account for the paradoxes of the police programs in Africa. The use of police aid 19 to create a modernized security apparatus for regimes with little public support 20 further shaped the high levels of abuse, as did the flooding of poor nations with 21 advanced weaponry.

24 TRAINING AND THE VIETNAM WAR

25 The OPS program was largest in South Vietnam, where it exemplified the 26 coercive character of American social policing efforts and helped to arm the 27 most reactionary elements in society with all of the modern instruments of 28 repression. It proved to be disastrous, nevertheless, geostrategically and pointed 29 to the limits of American social engineering efforts and power. Training of the 30 police began in 1955 as a central dimension to America’s nation-building cam-
31 paign on behalf of President Ngo Dinh Diem, who replaced French puppet 32 emperor Bao Dai following the temporary division of the country under the 33 1954 Geneva Accords. Valued for his anticommunism, Diem had little interest 34 in developing a Western-style democracy and wanted to establish his own

1 political dynasty.⁸⁹ The police operation was run by professors from Michigan
2 State University (MSU) under contract with the State Department, whose aim, 3 in the words of political scientist Wesley R. Fishel, was to facilitate law and order 4 so as to create the conditions necessary for economic and social development 5 and the “enlargement of freedom and prosperity.”⁹⁰ They urged police to 6 develop a more efficient record gathering system and modeled Diem’s Sureté 7 after the American FBI, arming it with twelve-gauge shotguns, sedans, ammuni-
8 tion, and riot-control equipment to counter subversion. There were few 9 pretenses from the beginning that the police were anything but a political 10 instrument, with many of the top officials, including Sureté Director Nguyen 11 Ngoc Le, having been previously trained by France.⁹¹

12 After Diem’s forces helped to dismantle the Binh Xuyen criminal network, 13 Fishel advised him to crack down on narcotic smuggling to cement his political 14 legitimacy.⁹² The MSU team further developed an identity card system to 15 monitor political activity as part of Diem’s anticommunist denunciation 16 campaign.⁹³ Those found with links to the Vietminh, who had led the liberation 17 struggle against France, were arrested and faced torture at an assortment of 18 prison camps, or were “disappeared,” as internal reports conceded.⁹⁴ U.S.
19 support was crucial in shaping South Vietnam’s evolution into what Foreign 20 Affairs described as a “quasi-police state marred by arbitrary arrests, censorship 21 of the press and the absence of political opposition.”⁹⁵ The passage of Law 10/59

4 In 1961, after taking over from Michigan State, the OPS sent advisers to 5 Malaya to learn how the police could be used to fight "Communist terrorism" 6 and destroy the "nexus between civilians and the insurgents."⁹⁷ Over the next 7 fourteen years, working with the Public Safety Division of the U.S. Operations 8 Mission to Vietnam (USOM), the OPS provided more than 300 advisers and 9 $300 million towards this goal, bolstering the number of police from 16,000 to 10 122,000. They funded eight specialized training schools and built over five 11 hundred rural police stations and high-tech urban headquarters equipped with 12 firearm ranges, computer systems, and padded interrogation rooms.⁹⁸ The OPS 13 also helped to create a telecommunications network linking police headquarters 14 in rural villages to major cities such as Saigon. Emphasis was placed on building 15 a corps of informants and developing a climate of fear in which people would be 16 afraid to challenge the government.⁹⁹ Penetration by the NLF, however, and a 17 lack of ideological conviction on the part of U.S.-trained forces helped to stymie 18 these efforts, to the frustration of many American advisers who could not get 19 around the strength of Vietnamese nationalism and political dynamic underlying 20 the civil war.¹⁰⁰ Language and cultural barriers and an underlying paternalism 21 helped to strain social relations, further, and made communications difficult, 22 limiting effectiveness.¹⁰¹

23 Performing duties that would be subcontracted to private mercenaries in 24 later wars, the OPS developed "Tiger Battalions" to escort and protect key 25 government officials and to serve as emergency riot control units. They were 26 given special permission to "apply force against the VC."¹⁰² In July 1963,

1 according to OPS adviser Ray Lundgren, in spite of the “amazing results” 2 yielded by riot control courses, police displayed “unnecessary brutality” in 3 suppressing a peaceful Buddhist rally against religious persecution and govern-4 ment violence, beating monks and other civilians. They then arrested them and 5 herded them into trucks, which backed into the crowd and ran several people 6 over. Police later scuffled with newsmen trying to report the day’s events.¹⁰³ 7 Buddhists responded by engaging in self-immolation, bringing international 8 attention to their plight and the crisis enveloping the country.¹⁰⁴

9 In an attempt to maximize social control in the face of mounting popular 10 resistance, the OPS expanded the surveillance program first initiated by MSU.
11 They issued identity cards to everyone over the age of fifteen and also developed 12 a Family Census program, enabling police to amass a set of fingerprints, housing 13 information, and data on the political beliefs of nearly twelve million people 14 (Figure 3).¹⁰⁵ Once dissidents were identified, the police would undertake 15 sweeps in their villages, usually late at night, and “arrested anyone under the 16 remotest suspicion of being left-wing,” as one witness put it. “The government 17 has a blacklist of suspects, but I understand that wives, mothers and fathers—18 anyone with the slimmest association with those on it, are being caught in the 19 net.”¹⁰⁶

20 Reflecting the increased militarization of the police, the OPS established 21 over 650 checkpoints to monitor movement and intercept guerrilla supplies, and 22 created a river-boat patrol squad on the Mekong Delta armed with assault 23 rifles.¹⁰⁷ From 1965 to 1969, police confiscated over twenty-two million kilos of 24 contraband, including foodstuff, medicine, firearms, and ammunition, and 25 claimed to have detained 458,000 suspected NLF collaborators.¹⁰⁸ They also 26 widely harassed civilians, which the OPS tried to curtail through instruction in 4 a 70 percent increase in arrest rates and contributed to further violations of civil 5 liberties, due in part to the imposition of draconian prison sentences, including 6 the death penalty.¹¹³ Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs (BNDD) agents 7 meanwhile suspected that officers were skimming the profits from all seizures, 8 which one OPS adviser evidently concluded presented a “major problem in 9 narcotics investigations.”¹¹⁴ Corruption was alleged to have permeated even 10 among prison wardens who regularly sold narcotic contraband on the black 11 market.¹¹⁵

12 As with broader modernization programs, local noncooperation and resis-13 tance to American drug policies was enhanced by the attempt to impose Western 14 societal standards that were not necessarily universal. The massive social dislo-15 cation bred by the war and high profitability of the black market economy 16 amidst an influx of Western luxury goods lay at the root of the “legendary” 17 corruption of police, who developed rackets on PX goods and regularly stole 18 refugee relief supplies. They also engaged in shakedowns of businessmen and 19 farmers, causing them to gravitate to the revolutionary side, and intimidated 20 voters in staged elections.¹¹⁶ One Village Chief commented, “The police

1 'protect' the populace the same way that gangsters 'protected' businesses from 2 which they wanted to squeeze a profit."¹¹⁷

3 From the perspective of Vietnamese nationalists, OPS advisers served as a 4 symbol of foreign coercion and imperialism, especially in light of the repressive 5 tactics employed by their protégés. They were often the target of guerrilla 6 attacks, with the NLF emerging as "heroes" in many communities for blowing 7 up police precincts and thus "protecting the people from police abuses," as with 8 the Vietminh during the French occupation.¹¹⁸ On November 5, 1960, Dolph 9 Owens became the first Public Safety adviser killed after his convoy was 10 ambushed en route to the Counter-Guerrilla Training Academy at Cat Lo.
11 During the 1968 Tet offensive, field police units sustained over three thousand 12 casualties, including more than one thousand killed. Three U.S. advisers also 13 died. During the war as a whole, at least twenty-five lost their life.¹¹⁹

14 Part of the enmity stemmed from their role in developing South Vietnam's 15 draconian prison system, which was among the most "hated and feared entities" 16 in the country.¹²⁰ In the early 1970s, the South Vietnamese Committee to 17 Reform the Prisons calculated that it harbored 202,000 political prisoners—18 three times the number Amnesty International estimated were held in the Soviet 19 Union, East Germany, South Africa, and a half dozen other authoritarian states 20 combined.¹²¹ Between 1967 and 1973, the State Department spent at least $6.5 21 million for the maintenance and renovation of the forty-two major prisons run 22 by the GVN (Government of Vietnam) Department of Corrections and built

1 construction of over thirty state-of-the-art detention centers, where some of the 2 worst abuses took place.¹²³ The lack of legal representation and shortage of 3 lawyers made efforts to promote due process impossible. Secret reports dis-4 closed that at most three out of ten inmates had access to a trial.¹²⁴

5 Owing to massive overcrowding, administrative difficulties, and the subordi-6 nation of penal reform to the broader exigencies of the war, the conditions in 7 most prisons, according to internal OPS surveys, were “appalling.” Described as 8 “hells on earth,” garbage was often scattered across the floor, and inmates 9 suffered from malnutrition, diarrhea, and diseases like beriberi from a lack of 10 proper sanitation and diet, and ill-maintained kitchen facilities ridden with 11 vermin and flies.¹²⁵ Many prisoners were forced to use a “honey bucket” as a 12 toilet. Ventilation remained poor, and they were also deprived of medicines and 13 access to doctors.¹²⁶ At Kien Tung Provincial Prison, just ten kilometers from 14 the seat of government, adviser William C. Benson reported in February 1962 15 that the cells were “extremely dirty and the stench so nauseating” as to make him 16 sick.¹²⁷ Eye-witnesses reported prisoners being confined to tiny or crowded cells 17 ridden with cockroaches and rodents where they had to sleep standing up.
18 During the day, many were forced to work long hours making uniforms for the 19 ARVN. “Hard-headed inmates” and “communist criminals,” as the most non-20 cooperative and politicized were referred, faced restrictions on exercise oppor-21 tunities and the right to visitors. They were given courses, or “brainwashed,” as 22 OPS personnel conceded, in anticommunist ideology.¹²⁸ When noncompliant, 23 further, they were forced into solitary confinement indefinitely and often “hand-24 cuffed,” “bolted to the floor,” or immobilized by “leg irons,” which many 25 advisers claimed were necessary to prevent rioting and escape. Both occurred 26 with a wide frequency.¹²⁹

27 Rather than fostering conformity, oppressive prison conditions drove scores 28 of people into the arms of the NLF. After a tour of penal facilities in the Mekong 29 Delta, senior American adviser John Paul Vann, who advocated a “hearts and

1 minds” approach, commented: “I got the distinct impression that any detainees 2 not previously VC or VC sympathizers would almost assuredly become so after 3 their period of incarceration.”¹³⁰ Among those subjected to the harsh regimen 4 were pregnant women and children. Torture using every imaginable technique 5 was widely reported, including the forced drinking of lime solutions, water-6 boarding, and the rape and chaining together of prisoners.¹³¹ Poor education 7 among guards and the lack of oversight by chief jailers, who predominantly came 8 from military backgrounds and owed their positions to political favoritism, was 9 one factor accounting for the high levels of brutality, as were the hatreds 10 engendered by the war (and often whipped up by the United States). The 11 carryover of methods and personnel from the French era was also important.¹³²
12 One Public Safety adviser admitted in a private report that there were “sadistic 13 people in authority” whose interrogation methods were “terrible” and who 14 sometimes “beat prisoners to death.”¹³³ A Vietnamese woman recalled, “When 15 you were being interrogated, you could hear the screams of people being 16 tortured. There was a popular saying among the police—kong danh do co—“If 17 they are innocent, beat them until they become guilty.”¹³⁴ A Mennonite volun-18 teer further told the Washington Post that prisoners faced “electroshocks, beat-19 ings with pins and being burned with cigarettes . . . Of the ones I talked to, none 20 had ever had a trial and many had never even had a hearing or knew how long 21 their sentence was.”¹³⁵

22 The most horrific abuses occurred in the notorious Con Son island prison, 23 whose repressive environment helped to create a groundswell of revolutionary 24 support, as had occurred in the French period.¹³⁶ In 1970, a congressional 25 delegation found inmates shackled to the floor in six-foot boxes, or “Tiger 26 Cages,” badly malnourished and beaten to the point of paralysis. Frank Walton, 27 head of the OPS and a former LAPD police chief, had sanctioned a report 28 stating that prisoners, whom he referred to as “reds who keep preaching the 29 commie line,” were “isolated in their cells for months” and permanently “bolted

1 to the floor or handcuffed to leg-irons.” This was standard practice shaped by 2 the war climate.¹³⁷

3 While some policymakers later tried to rationalize that Vietnamese cultural 4 standards resulted in the spread of political repression, the conditions in Ameri-
5 can army barrack prisons were themselves substandard. Inmates at Long Binh 6 Jail, who were overwhelmingly black and dissented against the war or were 7 charged with petty narcotic violations, reported being taunted and abused by 8 racist guards and treated like “caged animals,” while confined to “vermin” and 9 “rat-infested cells.”¹³⁸ Some had been deemed “emotionally unfit” for military 10 service because they were homosexual.¹³⁹ Those who failed to conform were 11 forced into solitary confinement in tiny con boxes lacking in proper ventila-12 tion.¹⁴⁰ These conditions eventually resulted in a series of major riots, which 13 exemplified the rebellious climate in the armed forces at the time and paradoxes 14 of U.S. international criminal justice policies that were ostensibly designed to 15 promote humanitarian reform.¹⁴¹ The state of prisons domestically, which were 16 beset by racial discrimination and violence and characterized by Attorney 17 General John A. Mitchell in a 1970 Washington Post exposé as a “national shame” 18 reflects on the moral hypocrisy further, as does the high levels of police 19 brutality.¹⁴²

American-trained police contributed to some of the worst atrocities in Vietnam through participation in the notorious Phoenix program, which was inaugurated in 1968 and aimed at destroying the revolutionary underground through use of sophisticated computer technology and intelligence systems.¹⁴³ K. Barton Osborne, a military intelligence specialist testified before Congress that “not a single suspect survived the interrogation process” and that he witnessed acts of torture such as the prodding of a suspect’s ear with a six inch dowel until it reached his brain and killed him.¹⁴⁴ Failing to land many high-level officials due to bad intelligence, CIA Director William Colby conceded that Phoenix led to the deaths of over twenty thousand civilians. This stemmed largely from police using the program to carry out extortion rackets and settle old scores, and because the imposition of death quotas encouraged indiscriminate killings.¹⁴⁵ A Phoenix operative who had served in Czechoslovakia during World War II commented, “The reports that I would send in on the number of communists that were neutralized reminded me of the reports Hitler’s concentration camp commanders sent in on how many inmates they had exterminated, each commander lying that he had killed more than the other to please Himmler.”¹⁴⁶ While more of a CIA than OPS-led operation per se, Phoenix epitomized how American police training programs helped to facilitate state repression and terror under the rubric of internal security and modernization.¹⁴⁷ The attempt at social control through imposition of an Orwellian regime of mass surveillance and torture lay at the root of the humanitarian abuses, which were all too characteristic of twentieth-century developments on both sides of the Iron Curtain.

CONCLUSION

Neglected in recent commentary on the Iraq occupation, where lessons from the past have gone ignored, police training and the associated prison construction programs have been a central component of American nation-buildin” strategies since the late nineteenth century. Displaying a faith in technology and modernization as a pathway to human progress, they have been designed as a cost-effective means of upholding the power base of strategic allies and

1 providing the internal security deemed necessary for the adoption of liberal-2 capitalist development programs. The Kennedy administration was particularly 3 influential in championing policing initiatives as a pivotal dimension of its 4 flexible response doctrine, which sought to counter “wars of national liberation” 5 through unconventional methods. The Special Group on Counterinsurgency 6 spearheaded these efforts. It saw itself as being at the vanguard in a global 7 crusade against totalitarianism, though the forces that it trained were implicated 8 in torture and political violence and bequeathed a legacy of institutionalized 9 repression that was a hallmark of U.S. foreign policy influence.¹⁴⁸ This stemmed 10 in large part from the politicization and militarization of the police and the 11 providing of modern equipment to state security forces bent on stamping out 12 communist subversion, widely defined.

13 In 1973, in the face of congressional scrutiny and condemnations by human 14 rights groups and the antiwar left, the State Department reduced police assis-15 tance and phased out the OPS. The executive branch, nevertheless, found 16 alternative ways of funding, including through the military and through coun-17 ternarcotics programs, which employed many former OPS personnel and pro-18 vided extensive police aid.¹⁴⁹ Between 1973 and 1974, President Richard M.
19 Nixon increased the State Department’s counternarcotics budget in Argentina 20 from $3,000 to $347,000—the same total, not coincidentally that Congress had 21 cut from police training programs because of their support for methods of 22 “selective torture” and “assassination.”¹⁵⁰ In a televised press conference, Argen-23 tine Social Welfare Minister Jose Lopez Rega, who was ironically later forced 24 into exile amid charges that he funded death squad operations through cocaine 25 trafficking, openly proclaimed that American funding intended for drug war 26 purposes would “be used in the anti-guerrilla campaign as well.”¹⁵¹ Stan Goff, a 27 Special Forces officer who headed a counternarcotics training team in the early 28 1980s in Colombia, where American-trained police were implicated in extraju-29 dicial killings and the torture of suspected guerrilla collaborators, commented, 30 “The training that I conducted was anything but counter-narcotics. It was 31 updated Vietnam-style counter-insurgency, but we were told to refer to it as 32 counter-narcotics should anyone ask. This was a clear cover.”¹⁵² These revealing

1 quotes suggest that the War on Drugs has served the same primary function that 2 the OPS did during the 1960s and early 1970s, namely to promote counterin-3 surgency and social control in the developing world under the cover of humani-4 tarianism.¹⁵³ The end results, meanwhile, remained catastrophic—certainly for 5 the torture victims and “disappeared.” Their dismal fate sheds light on the dark 6 side of American modernization and social control efforts and the high human 7 cost of informal empire, which has gone neglected in too many scholarly 8 accounts.¹⁵⁴
